13. (Passage-Based – 1/3)

Passage (100 words):

In contemporary discourse, the overuse of the term "resilience" risks diluting its meaning. Originally denoting the psychological capacity to recover from trauma, the word now pervades corporate jargon, where it often signifies little more than the ability to tolerate stress-inducing environments without complaint. This semantic inflation raises critical questions: when resilience becomes synonymous with mere endurance, does it empower individuals, or does it subtly enforce compliance?

Question: In the passage, "semantic inflation" most nearly refers to:

- a) the enrichment of a word's meaning
- b) the overextension of a word's meaning

- c) the narrowing of a word's meaning
- d) the redundancy of linguistic choices

34. (Passage-Based – 2/3)

Passage (120 words):

The emergence of artificial intelligence has reignited age-old debates about human uniqueness. Proponents argue that AI merely mimics cognition without genuine understanding, echoing philosophical distinctions between "simulating" and "experiencing." Skeptics, however, note that once a system's outputs become indistinguishable from human reasoning, insisting on the absence of "true understanding" risks being little more than metaphysical hair-splitting. The crux lies not in whether machines think, but in whether society is prepared to ascribe agency and responsibility to non-human entities.

Question: According to the passage, the real issue is:

- a) whether AI is conscious
- b) whether AI can mimic human cognition
- c) whether society assigns agency to AI
- d) whether metaphysics can explain AI

Answer: c) whether society assigns agency to AI

---

35. (Passage-Based – 3/3)

Passage (100 words):

Historical narratives are rarely neutral; they are curated accounts shaped by prevailing ideologies. The victors' perspective often dominates, relegating alternative viewpoints to the margins. Yet, as new evidence surfaces and cultural paradigms shift, history itself is rewritten. Such fluidity challenges the assumption that history is a static record of facts; instead, it emerges as a contested terrain of interpretation.

Question: What does the passage imply about history?

- a) It is immutable and fact-based
- b) It is shaped by evidence alone
- c) It is dynamic and interpretive
- d) It is irrelevant in modern society

Answer: c) It is dynamic and interpretive
